The Making of Casanova

The film Casanova was directed by Federico Fellini, one of the most acclaimed directors in cinema history. Fellini cast David Hemmings in the lead role after seeing him in the 1966 film Blowup. Hemmings was a rising star at the time, and Fellini was impressed by his charisma and acting ability. Hemmings was initially hesitant to take on the role, as he was afraid of being typecast as a sex symbol. However, Fellini eventually convinced him to sign on, and the two men worked closely together to create a truly unforgettable character.

The film was shot on location in Venice, Paris, and London, and Fellini used a lavish production design to recreate the opulence and decadence of the 18th century. The film's costumes, sets, and cinematography are all stunning, and they help to create a truly immersive experience for the audience.
